These pictures were taken during the summer of 1936, in the heart of depression. At the time when businesses were paralyzed, men were eking a living for themselves and their families by goldmining in the area of the Illinois River (Oregon). A mining engineer in California formed a hydraulic placer mining company to operate on the property known as Oak Flat Ranch which was then owned by one Ed. Cox. (If I understand correctly he filed the original homestead papers. If he had lived he would be in his 90s now.) This mining company was made up of men from very diverse backgrounds. There was Pat, an Irishman who owned apartment houses in San Francisco; Guy, an electrician from the Seattle, Wn. area, and Dutch, a local man who also shipped Darlingtonia, which grew wild locally, to England. There was an Englishman, whose background no one knew. He cooked for the group. There was a real estate man from California. The mining engineer's son, who sold shoes and played in an orchestra in San Francisco, also worked in this manual removal of gold from the ground.
To Norm Peterson:

You will recall that I mentioned these pictures to you when you visited the Geological Society's meeting on April 8, 1976. They were taken during my visit at Oak Flat Ranch in 1936. I mounted the pictures on this board a number of years ago. It is obvious that I lacked the foresight to record detail that should have been recorded. Understandably, at the age I was then, I possibly could have been a little more interested in gold-digging than gold mining.

These pictures are yours to use in any way that will preserve the history of Gold Bond Mine for Josephine County—either in your office or local museum.
